Key drivers of job changes

COMPILED By BK SIDHU

DISSATISFACTION with work-life balance is the primary reason why people seek new job opportunities and in Malaysia, they prefer flexible work arrangements and a culture that respects personal time.

A lack of career growth opportunities comes a close second, particularly for younger generations (40%) who prioritise it more than their older counterparts (33%).

According to Randstad's recent Employer Brand Research Report, Gen Z (29%) are more likely to move on quickly when they lose interest in their jobs.

The report also notes that compensation seems to play a more significant role for men, with 37% citing low pay amid rising living costs as a key motivator.

The survey attracted approximately 173,000 respondents and covered 6,084 companies worldwide, including 2,500 respondents from Malaysia.

It reveals that 45% of respondents in Malaysia consider themselves minorities at work, due to factors such as ethnicity, nationality, religion, or disability.

Around 60% of respondents who identify as minorities reported facing career obstacles, and 19% of Gen Z respondents cited their religious beliefs as a reason for feeling like minorities.

Additionally, 31% of women in tech believe they do not receive equal pay for equal work.

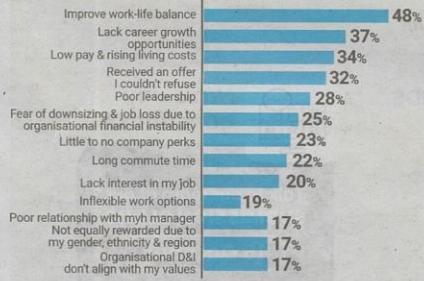

The report highlights that artificial intelligence offers significant potential to boost worker efficiency and productivity, but there is a concerning gap in its adoption in Malaysia.
